“I didn’t build red earth studio simply to teach pottery. I wanted to create a place where we can do more research, experiment, and where people could slow down, make with their hands, and leave feeling a little more connected-to themselves and to others.

Clay remembers what we have forgotten.

Before there was language, there were hands. Before there was meaning, there was making.

Long before we learned to explain ourselves, we already knew how to shape the world around us—pressing, pulling, forming something from nothing, leaving a mark that said: I was here, I made this. This is real.

Somewhere along the way, we forgot.

We forgot the particular intelligence of hands.

Clay remembers what we have forgotten.

Not just a bowl. Not just a vessel. A moment of return.
